Seven Pillars of Wisdom is T.H. Lawrence's account of the 1916-1918 Arab revolt against the Ottoman Empire. It offers a thorough look at war and its consequences. Lawrence was an excellent gymnast and a skilled mechanic. During the revolt, he carried Malory's King Arthur's Death in his bag, and in later life he translated Homer's Odyssey. Soon called "Prince Dynamite", Lawrence proved to be — in the words of military historian B.H. Liddell Hart (1895-1970) —

“a supreme artist of war” for his highly effective military tactics. (The Washington Post, March 9 2022; adapted)

B.H. Liddell Hart

[a] regarded Lawrence to be a great military strategist.

[b] compared Lawrence to Malory’s King Arthur.

[c] considered Lawrence to be a great translator.

[d] provided a review of Seven Pillars of Wisdom.

Lexis in context

When one of America’s earliest open-plan offices debuted in Racine, Wisconsin, in 1939, women were less than one-third of the country’s working force. That early office was not so different from the one that modern workers experience. It was designed to suit a particular employee: someone who could stay at work until late because he didn’t have to rush home to make dinner for his children; someone pleased to meet the boss because it meant time to chat and talk about golf. (The New York Times, March 10 2022; adapted)

“suit” in this context means

[a] be right for

[b] be boring for

[c] be contrary to

[d] be annoying for

The UK Department for Education (DfE) estimates that 22% of state school pupils, or more than 1.7 million, were “persistently absent” in the 2021 autumn term. That appears to agree with data showing that hundreds of thousands of children were absent from school with confirmed and suspected cases of Covid-19. However, the DfE also estimates that overall attendance rates in primary state schools are returning to normal – 95% in February – and just 0.7% of pupils absent for Covid-related reasons on 3 March, compared with 2.2% in February. (The Guardian, March 9 2022; adapted)

In the 2021 autumn term

- [a] school attendance was down to around 80% .
 - [b] 95% of pupils had Covid-related symptoms.
